dispose of, mainly by members of the Virginia Auxilliary Board. Mount Vernon is situated on the south city, and occupies a gradually swelling e'evation, covered with shade trees both native and foreign, and commands a fine view up and down the river. This old residence was built in the early part of eighteenth century by Lawrence Washington, and at his death it fell by inheritance to George, his brother. The place, we are told, was named after Admiral Vernon, under whose command Lawrence Washington served in the West Indies. When George Washington came into possession of the property now called "dependencies," were afterwards added by him and the home landed estate much enlarged and otherwise embellished. Most of his life from boygood was spent here, and everything obervable in the arrangement of lawns, shrubbery, gardens, buildings, etc., are suggestive that, notwithstanding that this great man was soldier, statesman and financier, yet he found time to devote some part of his active life to the ornate and beautiful. George Washington bequeathed the hit's me.' property at his death to Bushrod Washngton, from whom it passed to John A.

The mansion proper is a wooden structure two main stories in height, with a finished attic and dormer windows. It is built on a substantial brick founda- says he. tion. The chimneys are large and made of brick, triangular in shape, with fireplaces in the corners of the rooms they serve. The weatherboarding or siding is made of beveled boards ten inches in width, one and a-half inches in thickness, tongued and grooved and carefully fitted together. The boards are cut across, with beveled groove, so as to represent a paneled wall. The length of the building is ninety-four feet, and the width thirty-two feet; height of first story ten feet nine inches; second story day, Rastus." seven feet eleven inches; attic six feet

The lower hallway is ample in size, and is elaborately moulded and carved. The carving here in some of the rooms shows a marvel of patient work by the ouilders of that day and time. The library, Washington's chamber where he died, Miss Nellie Custis music room, Mrs. Washington's room and Lafayette's and the dining-rooms are all to the river front an open colonnade running its whole length. The columns are slender and square, slightly tapering nearly plain frieze surmounted by open window sills. The roof is crowned by an octagon shaped tower. The rear approach or land front of the building is plain, and faces a beautiful lawn, which is flanked on either hand by the annexes or "dependencies" and other outbuildings. These "dependencies" were used as kitchens, servants' rooms, etc., and are united to the main building by gracefully curved colonnades. At a recent meeting of the board of managers the architect, Cadt. Edgerton Rogers, of Richmond, .Va., submitted plans and specifications for the reproduction of this building at Chicago in the lot set apart for Virginia by the World's Columbian Exposition authorities, and the constructors will begin at

Much of the interior work will be diffi cult and costly to reproduce, but just as far as it is possible for this to be done_it

In the large banquet hall it is proposed to provide seats, where Virginians can rest and meet their friends. In the library will be gathered books of Virginia authors and paintings. In other rooms will be placed such things as may be collected in the departments of fine arts, archeology, etc., or those things most fitting and appropriate for their ried they are ashamed to show how much they don't. Parting with a dear friend at the grave is a good deal like parting with one when you start on a journey and leave him behind. You cry the first mile or two, and believe you will cry forever; James J. Corbett says he will not fight for a year. Next fall he will debut soon you become interested in new posit money for a match with Charles scenes, now people, and new experiences and forget him. You imagine when you leave the cemetery you will never forget the friend you left there, but you do.
